Me and Malte have managed to meet our project owners' user stories each week. Also, I have contributed to setting up the user stories and the team reflection along with the rest of the team. During the sprint, we had misevaluated the size of our user story which meant that we finished it a bit eary. This meant that I had a lot of time over which I could have used to help the rest of the team with their deliveries should they need any help. As it turned out, both the other teams had problems with their products. However, I did not receive this information until the end of the sprint. Therefore, I did not help the team as much as I could have. In order to have used my time better, I could instead of just letting my team know that I have time over; I could have also been more active to ask if my team needed more help.